WORKSHOP

Create Peaceful, Compassionate Classrooms Through Solving the Riddle of Preschoolers' Challenging Behavior

If preschoolers knew how to use words to resolve conflicts on their own, they would do so without teachers' reminders. They need adults to help them learn how to do so through direct coaching and supportive encouragement. Similarly, challenging behaviors do not generally disappear through the exertion of external control by adults, but rather through problem solving, strategic communication that engages cooperation, and the provision of individual intervention plans as needed to meet childrens' needs and support healthy functioning and the development of self regulation skills. This brain based approach to managing challenging behaviors not only creates compassionate classrooms, it will also help teachers meet the requirements of the new Illinois state law regarding preventing preschool expulsion.
